

Das Superweib (Super Broad)

Franziska, who is actually an actress, is sitting with her two sons in a four-room apartment playing with building blocks while her husband Will Gross is in the Caribbean working on his new series as a TV producer. One day she accidentally files for a divorce while believing she is buying a house in the name of her absent husband. Franziska's attorney asks her to write down what her marriage is like. That evening Franziska sits at her kitchen table and describes her married life with growing enthusiasm. Finally someone is interested in her! The attorney lets his mother read the stuff, and she hands it over to a publishing house. "Happily Unmarried" becomes a bestseller. Right when Franziska really starts to enjoy her new independent life with house, children and fame, her spouse is standing at the door to film a certain Franka Zis. Clueless to the fact that it is his own marriage that he wants to capture on film, he tries to charm his way through to the obviously unreachable successful author. Franziska now has everything she ever dreamed of. But the dream turns into a nightmare when Franziska agrees to write the script while Will Gross produces it, and the story of their marriage from HIS point of view is completely different from HERS...

Written with wit, irony and charm this third novel by the successful author Hera Lind keeps the tears rolling down your face. In the summer of 1994, "Die Welt" printed the headline, "Hera Lind in Every Beach Bag."

"Das Superweib" appeared in 1994 and sold 2.8 million copies. The novel was made into a movie, and 3 million people viewed it. The movie is shown regularly on German television.
